Recently, I visited the Burj Khalifa with my classmate Nodirbek and with my favourite teacher John. Our university provided us the free tickets to the Aquarium and Burj Khalifa itself. This tour gave us the opportunity to learn more about the history of the city and look at it from the height of the tower itself and see interesting exhibits. The Burj Khalifa was opened on January 6, 2006, which is owned by a large company called Emaar. To buy this large property, you need to pay about 1.5 billion. I am sure that this building is worth their money!
We got acquainted with many sections of the exposition also we see the construction history of this beautiful building. Moreover, the design of the building is very unusual and looks rich. Everything is top-notch. After the Burj Khalifa, we got a little hungry and had a bite to eat at Freddy’s restaurant.

Next we went to the Aquarium, where there were a lot of species of plants, animals and fishes. It was not too boring as in many typical aquariums where you can just watch the water. Here we had a chance to touch the bamboo sharks and other species of fish.
In general I really liked the tour and I learned so many new things about the construction of the tallest building in the world and many types of fish in the aquarium.
